Superbrands, Brands That Seem Like Family

The Superbrands seal has been in Mexico for 11 years, recognizing brands that have what it takes to stay in your memory and your heart. We tell you how this marketing exercise works.
We live among goods and services that we like: cable channels, cosmetics, diapers, banks, wines, notebooks and soccer teams. We don’t even always think of them as products. We are familiar with their logos, feel comfortable with their colors and cuddle up to their campaigns as if they were home sweet home.

Companies that achieve that level of intimacy deserve attention. And that’s what Superbrands does every year when it certifies the most recognizable brands on the Mexican market. Last October they came out with their ninth book.

How Superbrands Came to Be

The Superbrands marketing recognition exercise has been around for several years now. On a 1994 radio program in the United Kingdom, directors and marketing experts were interviewed and asked about how their companies had emerged: their development and product line. In 1996, the radio interview led to an annual publication that also granted Superbrand certification to selected brands. The Superbrand concept started being reproduced in other countries around the globe, currently totaling 97. It has been in Mexico since 2005.

Brand councils are created in all of those countries and are made up of people who are well known for their marketing experience. They go over a list of 1500 brands, where the following stand out:

1. Knowledge of the brand or brand positioning.
2. Brand longevity.
3. Consumer loyalty to the brand.

Superbrands

This year, besides the 31 brands selected, two individual were distinguished for having made brands of themselves, inspiring success and effort among consumers. They are commentator Martha Debayle: “Her success is impressive. She has three magazines with huge circulation, and people aspire to be like her, someone with values and success,” and triathlete Luis Álvarez: “To be Iron Man, you have to swim nearly four miles, pedal 112 on a bicycle and end with a marathon. That means admirable physical condition, by a person who shows that it can also be done in Mexico.”

“We measure how well the brand is recognized in Mexico, whether it’s Korean, Japanese, Chinese; and that it’s positioned as a good brand. Many have made use of the book to show their products off in Central and South America, where they are opening up the market.”

Juan Martínez, CEO and president of the Mexican Brands Council

Judge, but Not Party

Impartiality in the Mexican Brands Council comes from abstention: members cannot vote for brands they are involved with, even the areas the brands participate in. That is how they manage to choose the brands without affecting interests outside Superbrands.

Next year they want to include a category of Sustainable Superbrands, recognizing companies that have taken a responsible role in environmental conservation. “We found out about a brand, Bamboocycles, belonging to a young industrial designer. Its capacity is still artisanal, but it has become a sustainable brand because it is promoting the use of bicycles. We try to include these brands,” explains Juan Martínez.

Brands in Mexico are circumscribed within a vigorous ecosystem of innovation, responsibility and direct communication with clients. Superbrand awards that effort of making a brand a familiar activity.
